TACTICAL EVIDENTIARY SIGNIFICANCE (ARCHIVAL SENTINEL ANALYSIS):
Military Governor General Leonard Wood explicitly confesses to President McKinley that the Platt Amendment left 'no independence... in Cuba' and made it 'practically an American dependency' while giving the U.S. control of the global sugar trade.

VERBATIM PRIMARY SOURCE TRANSCRIPTION:

Headquarters Military Governor, Island of Cuba, Havana, October 29, 1901.

To the President, Executive Mansion, Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. President:

There is, of course, little or no independence left in Cuba under the Platt Amendment. With the control which we have over its foreign relations and its financial affairs, and with the naval stations which we hold, the island is practically an American dependency, and we practically control the sugar trade of the world. The business of the island must come to the United States. The island is being gradually Americanized and in time will come into the Union as a natural result.

Very respectfully yours,
LEONARD WOOD, Major General, Military Governor of Cuba.
